See wildflowers in a rare coastal grassland

Protecting Scotland’s wildlife for the future
www.swt.org.uk
This reserve was purchased by the Scottish Wildlife Trust in 1998 with help from Fife Council. It is an example of a lime-rich coastal grassland that is increasingly rare on the east coast of Scotland.

During the Second World War, sea defences were along much of Britain’s coastline, and today a line of anti-tank blocks separates this reserve from grazed land to the east. Another war time legacy is a pair of concrete pill boxes.

Dune grassland provides the perfect soil for plants requiring special growing conditions. In spring cowslips litter the ground and in summer purple milk-vetch, meadow crane’s bill, viper’s bugloss and many more are found growing here.

Skylarks, meadow pipits and stonechats nest on the reserve, while buzzards and kestrels can be seen overhead hunting for rabbits and voles.

Offshore in the summer, terns and gannets make an appearance and in the winter, red-throated divers, scoters and long-tailed ducks can be seen. Eiders are present all year round.

Rock, sand and mud support a variety of seaweed and animal life. Herons and waders such as curlew, redshank, turnstone and oystercatcher feast on the abundance of food in the bay.

Butterflies, including common blue, small copper and meadow brown, and a great variety of land snails represent just a tiny fraction of the vast diversity of insects and other invertebrates found here.

Walkers can follow the Fife Coastal Path which passes through the reserve behind the main dune and beyond.
